➤ short synopsis

A pious sister and her inflexible magistrate brother mourn the passing of their beloved mother. To honour her memory, the siblings burn the midnight oil over their mother's old correspondences with family members whom she so often spoke of, until they come across a letter from someone she had never mentioned.

➤ inspired by

Guy de Maupassant's 1882 short story "A Dead Woman's Secret" (original title: La Veillée).

➤ runtime

approximately 10 minutes long.

DIRECTOR'S EPISTLE

Hailing from Provincial France, Guy de Maupassant was always part of my scholastic upbringing, his pessimistic themes and disillusioned characters resonating with my more macabre condition. Like many of the author's best short stories, 'A Dead Woman's Secret' has a dark and mysterious undertones despite its extrinsic simplicities, much like my own work. It is a cautionary tale of moral virtue as a cudgel that destroys people's lives, extolling how sanctimonious dogma breeds restrictive multi-generational prejudice and intolerance.

My appreciation for the story developed while living with my grandparents during the pandemic. This experience was incredibly impactful on my perception of them, as I had to come to terms with certain hard truths about them during my time there. It made me realise just how much our opinions of others is so often influenced by biased impressions, and how any new information about a person can drastically alter our judgment of them.

I found this brief, yet meaningful story relatable in many ways. Through the cinematic medium of a calling-card short film, I seek to explore those facets of the human condition - whether it is truly possible to know someone - while serving as memento mori to live true to one's self - especially LGBTQ+ members - despite any fear of castigation that living in secret may shelter you from.

AESTHETIC APPROACH

Filmed in an intimate 1.19:1 aspect ratio with static frames to make it a more authentic period piece, evocative of cinema's earliest days, particularly German expressionism. This old-fashioned style of immobile shots with a box-like ratio carries several meta-textual implications, including building a claustrophobic mood mirroring the protagonists' narrow points of view. The square-ish shape also mimics that of the titularly symbolic letters being read by our characters.

Lit for a near-monochromatic sepia-heavy colour palette reminiscent of 19th century photography, with a heavy reliance on diegetic sources to motivate low and high-contrast lighting. This sole light source creates dark backgrounds with starkly lit subjects, offering dimensionality to the space and dynamism to the characters and, metaphorically, their psyche as they seek balance between light and dark, good and evil, right and wrong. Such stylistic chiaroscuro techniques also creates a dramatic, shadowy mood, as well as build tension and suspense by bringing secret hidden details to the surface for all to witness.
